“Identity, archaeology, art and elementary education in the northwest of Argentina”

In northwestern Argentina, the native historical process started as early as 11,000 years BP ago, interrupted in the late fifteenth century by the Spanish Conquest and Colonization. Since then, and during the subsequent construction of the Argentinean nationality until today, the representation of the past has become a field of power struggles between the official version promoted by primary school reaffirming a national identity and the other version encouraged by the communities supporting a reconstruction of a new aboriginal identity. This tense relationship is evident in a survey of archaeological knowledge, value of archaeology and other contextual data embedded within some primary schools in indigenous communities in Northwestern Argentina, some of which will be presented in this lecture.
